Biographical sketch

Little is known about the family background, the childhood and education of Otto Schüssler who was born into a working-class family in Leipzig (Saxony, Germany) on August 2, 1905. He played an important rôle in the German and international Trotskyist movement of the 1930s and served as secretary to Trotsky several times.

Schüssler earned his living first as a worker1 and obtained a considerably broad general knowledge by intensive self-teaching and reading. Politically he was a close sympathizer of the far-left and became a member of the KAPD (Kommunistische Arbeiter-Partei Deutschlands, Communist Workers’ Party of Germany), a left splinter party which had emerged from the KPD (Komunistische Partei Deutschlands, Communist Party of Germany) in 1920.

In 1928 he became – together with E.H. Ackerknecht (also known as Bauer) and R. Sobolevicius (also known by pseudonyms such as Roman Well or Robert Soblen and some years later exposed as a GPU provocateur) – a founding member of a small Leipzig group of left oppositionists called Bolschewistische Einheit (Bolshevik Unity). This group could win over several leftist dissidents from the Saxonian KPD; some two years later, in March 1930, it fused with the Trotskyist minority tendency within the Leninbund (Lenin League) and with the Linke Opposition am Wedding und in der Pfalz (Left Opposition in Wedding and in the Palatinate) to form the Vereinigte Linke Opposition (United Left Opposition). Schüssler became one of the members of the Reichsleitung (meaning: the political committee) of the VLO; other leading figures of the VLO in 1930 were A. Grylewicz, J. Kohn, K.

1) According to some sources he was born on August 8 and died in 1982. Our data are based on information which we thankfully got from Erik Malo-Schuessler, a grandson of Otto Schüssler, in 2018
2) According to some sources he was employed as a packer with a Leipzig printing office specializing in art printing while according to other sources he earned his living as a bookbinder
Landau, H. Schwalbach, Josef Weber, E. Wolf, the just-mentioned E.H. Ackerknecht, R. Sobolevicius et al. Like most of the other Leipzig Trotskyists, Schüssler sided with the VLO majority when a sharp and long-lasting factional struggle – mixed up with unbridgeable personal animosities – occurred within the ranks of the VLO ending in a split in 1931: both the majority and the minority – the latter under the leadership of K. Landau – now called themselves Linke Opposition der KPD (Bolschewiki-Leninisten) (Left Opposition of the KPD, Bolshevik-Leninists); while the Landau group continued to publish the (ex-)VLO organ Der Kommunist, the Grylewicz (majority) group launched a new organ, Permanente Revolution to which Schüssler, too, contributed articles after having proved his talents as a writer already in Der Kommunist and in various internal documents.

In spring 1932 Trotsky's elder son Lev Sedov, who at that time was living in Berlin as a student, as managing editor of the Bulletin’ oppozitsii (Bulletin of the Opposition) and as a liaison man of the International Secretariat of the International Left Opposition, looked for a German-language secretary to his father. On Ackerknecht's recommendation Sedov chose Schüssler for the job, who thus in May 1932 went to Büyükk Ada (Prinkipo Islands, Turkey) where exiled Leon Trotsky had settled some years before. Schüssler became one of Trotsky's favourite secretaries and carried out a lot of valuable secretarial, editorial and translation work during his one-year stay at Trotsky's home. In November 1932 Schüssler accompanied Trotsky on his famous trip to Copenhagen, and in 1933 a booklet featuring a balance sheet and documentation of the communists' disastrous policy in view of the rise of fascism to power in Germany was published with a preface by Leon Trotsky under Schüssler's pseudonym Oskar Fischer.

After leaving Büyükk Ada in April 1933, Schüssler undertook a clandestine trip to Germany, commissioned with the re-organisation of the now illegal and clandestine Trotskyist groups which soon had to suffer from harsh repression after the Nazis' seizure of power in Germany. When the last full-scale national conference of the German Trotskyists on German territory was clandestinely held in March 1933 in Leipzig, Schüssler in absentia became elected a member of the AK (Auslandskomitee, Foreign Committee) of the renamed Internationale Kommunisten Deutschlands (IKD, International Communists of Germany), the German section of the International Left Opposition (ILO)3. The AK was created in order to secure the political leadership of the IKD and to maintain liaison with other members and tendencies of the emigration and last but not least with the local Trotskyist underground groups operating in Germany under the difficult conditions of a fascist dictatorship.

One of the main tasks of the AK was securing the regular appearance of IKD's new exile paper Unser Wort which began to be published in Prague in Spring 1933 under the editorship of Heinz Epe (pseud: Walter Held). In Summer 1933 Schüssler went to Prague (Czechoslovakia) succeeding Epe (Held) at the editorial board of Unser Wort and eventually transferring it to Paris in Autumn 1933, where he settled until 1939, with only a few interruptions. Besides being contributing editor of Unser Wort – signing most of his articles by 'O-r', the short of his pseudonym Oskar Fischer – he published articles in other contemporaneous Trotskyist papers, too.

According to Pierre Broué, Schüssler from November 1933 until April 1934 served again – perhaps only occasionally – as a secretary to Trotsky who at that time lived at Barbizon (France).

In December 1934 Schüssler participated in the clandestine IKD conference, held in Dietikon (near Zürich, Switzerland), which regarding the question of entryism made a hotly debated decision in favour of Trotsky's suggestions. After the Dietikon conference, Schüssler (again using mostly the pseudonym Oskar Fischer), together with his friend and close collaborator Josef Weber (Johre) was the main leader and inspirer of the IKD. But the Johre-Fischer leadership – as this leading duo used to be called – was challenged again and again by various other German Trotskyist exile leaders who continued to form mini oppositions as for example did Walter Nettelbeck (pseudonym: Jan Bur); two times Johre-Fischer even lost the AK leadership for a short period of time. After several years

3) ILO was renamed International Communist League (ICL) in 1933 and Movement for the Fourth International in 1936.
4) Broué, Pierre: [Biographical sketch] Schüssler, Otto, dit Julián Suárez / P.B. [i.e. Pierre Broué], in: Dictionnaire biographique du mouvement ouvrier international / L'Allemagne / sous la dir. de Jacques Drèze, Paris, 1990, p. 436. Please note, that other sources, however, only mention Schüssler's service as a secretary from May 1932 to April 1933 and from February to August 1940.
characterized by continuing self-laceration, vitriolic factional struggles and even small-minded personal animosities, the IKD (AK) at the end of the 1930s had dwindled to a tiny and marginalized group, thus Schüssler and Weber (Johre) found themselves as leaders of a more or less phantom organization. Some years before they had fiercely rejected Trotsky's suggestion to integrate the Gruppe Internationale (Group The International), a Paris exile group led by the former Zinovievists Ruth Fischer and Arkadij Maslow, into the IKD, and in 1937 a struggle for influence flared up between Johre-Fischer and Rudolf Klement – another member of the AK of the IKD and at the same time an eminent figure of the Administrative Secretariat of the Movement for the Fourth International – which culminated in the launching of a rival paper issued by Klement, Der einzige Weg.

It should be added that Schüssler (under his pseudonym Fischer) and Weber (under his pseudonym Johre) participated as German delegates in both the international conference of the Movement for the Fourth International (allegedly held in Geneva, factually held in Paris in July 1936) and in the founding conference of the Fourth International (allegedly held in Lausanne, factually held in Périgny [near Paris] in September 1938). At the latter conference Schüssler sided with those delegates who endorsed Trotsky's motion to immediately proclaim the new, Fourth International.

Shortly after the founding conference of the Fourth International, Schüssler decided to leave Paris and to go to Mexico where he arrived by ship in February 1939. He served as Trotsky's secretary (and guard) again, along with it learning Spanish and engaging in the Partido Obrero Internacionalista (POI, Internationalist Workers' Party), the Mexican section of the Fourth International. He lived in the fortress-like Trotsky house at Coyoacán until Trotsky's assassination in August 1940. Some 3 months earlier, in May 1940, Schüssler was arrested together with one of Trotsky's American secretaries, Charles Cornell, by the Mexican police colonel Leandro Apolinar Sánchez Salazar accused of passivity during the machine-gun raid on Trotsky's house led by Mexican Stalinist painter David Alfaro Siqueiros. However, at the personal intervention of Trotsky, who had remained uninjured in this assault, both Schüssler and Cornell were released after two days.

After the second (and fatal) attempt at Trotsky's life on August 20 by Jaime Ramón Mercader and his Trotsky's death the day after, Schüssler remained in Mexico, took up a job and continued to be active in the Mexican section of the Fourth International under his pseudonym Julián Suárez. When the Mexican section eventually split at the end of World War II, he sided with Octavio Fernández Vilchis who launched a new group, Grupo Socialista Obrero (GSO, Socialist Workers' Group). This dissident group – like some splinter groups in other countries, too – advocated a radical reform of Trotskyism including a total revision of its hitherto analysis of the class character of the USSR. Having abandoned some fundamentals of Trotskyism, GSO eventually was repudiated by the Fourth International in 1946 and went out of existence shortly thereafter.

For some time Schüssler irregularly contributed articles to the paper Dinge der Zeit which had been launched in Britain in 1947 and was later transferred to Germany by Schüssler's old friend and co-worker Weber (Johre) with whom he, however, had broken shortly after the War. Johre and with him the remnants of the IKD during the first years of the War had taken positions which were no longer compatible to those held by the International Secretariat; the IKD as a section of the FI factually did no longer exist at the end of the War. While Weber (Johre) became an advocate of the Movement for a Democracy of Content (Bewegung für Inhaltliche Demokratie), Schüssler during the late 1940s more and more turned to an anti-communist hard-liner before he totally withdrew from politics and lost any interest in political matters, even refusing any contact with people reminding him on his past. Since 1947 Schüssler was married with a Mexican teacher with whom he had four children and earned his living first at a neutral glass factory and then at the Secretariat of Public Education.

Retired, he died of a brain tumor, aged 74, in Azcapotzalco (a northwestern municipality of México, D.F.) on January 25, 1980.6
